Yes - a truly Kafkan neigh saying! You got him in a canter!

- Howard Dossor

Wow Peter!

I watched it once before breakfast, once after breakfast and will watch it many more times I am sure. It is very delicately put together, I love it... And a far cry from the more usual urban offerings for which I know and also love from you.

I can't wait to show it to Karen (she'll have a particular passion for the horse!).

Hope you are well.

Rob

- Robert Corner

Dear Peter,

This is a delight! I play it over and over ... and not least because of the Daseinsreim, so to speak. I have just written a few words about this very piece for a lecture I need to give to some Jungians. I've attached them.

With thanks, best greetings, and congratulations on your canny visual skills and refined (right on!) literary taste,

Stanley

- Stanley Alan Corngold

Professor of German and Comparative Literature, Emeritus.

(Princeton University) * Daseinsreim, translates to; Rhyme of existence

Peter

What a treat. I've seen it now three times and each time discover something new. The writing is wonderful, poetic, exuberant, lyrical.

The filming and editing are exceptional. How the images comfort the dialogue is just beautiful. There is the story, there is the film, and there is the elevation of the experience.

I was also thinking about the New Advocate film and how much I enjoyed your narration. Your voice was perfectly suited for the text.

Of course now that I know much more about Kafka's short life and how his legacy almost died with him adds just the right amount of salt to the meat of this incredible writer.

Well done, Peter. I really enjoyed it.

Thank you my dear friend,

Gunter

- Gunter Kleemann

Love it PT,

Truly wonderful and the cuts, particularly the hoof to face scratch and the yawn—hilarious! Your voice is so good!

- Yvonne Westbrook, MFT

Hi Peter,

Nice little movie, impressive reading. You could do voice-overs!

Looks like beautiful country.

Best, John

- John Deane

I must love you Pete if I subjected my dinosaur of a computer to downloading and watching. But loved it- the imagery, the irony, the narrative. Great stuff lad x

- Dick Aspel

P,

Your film got my day off to a good start. Well read and engaging imagery.

Thanks again and enjoy life.

Comment 1:

Wow! That is so powerful, PT. My heart almost leapt into my chest, seriously. You are fantastically moving in that piece—an incredible and undeniable presence. I watched it twice and will watch it again!

- Yvonne

Comment 2:

Dear Peter,

That is very powerful and wonderful. Thank you for the gift!

It happens that this very "argument" is supported and developed by Thomas Mann, as I just happen to report in the books below! They will be yours in February, inshallah!

Very best from Stanley

Dear Stanley,

I'm overwhelmed by your response. Thank you so much for this comment and, as always, I look forward to read these books on Mann. I certainly got a lot from your piece Mann as a Reader of Nietzsche, that I got from Academia.

Very best to you too and many thanks again,
Peter

Comment 3:

Very nice performance!! Very honest.

I'm sure we can all identify with some part, if not all, of his internal conflict.

Funny, I was just delving into Jacobs wrestling with God story.

Very interesting man Kazantzakis.

A bit "naughty"

- Gunter Kleeman

Comment 4:

Peter,

I've been told of your commitment to acting and now I've seen you for the first time. A powerful and decisive performance. Presence beyond the screen.

Cheers Phil

SIDEWINDER

Art with a Punch

Peter Leiss' Sidewinder a review by Howard F Dossor

In boxing parlance, a sidewinder is a punch that lands on the side of your jaw, reaching you unexpectedly and horizontally from the side. Its effect on the brain is immediate. Thus it is a useful term in the vocabulary of the art critic. Art should "sock it to you."

Peter Leiss' Sidewinder, a three-armed punch to our sensibility does have an immediate effect upon the brain. It addresses it with the question, "Hey! What in the world is going on?" Then we go numb and dumb under its real impact as it opens up to us a world we would prefer to believe does not exist - the inchoate world of our cities and of our aesthetic standards: for here is a catalogue of the detritus of our urbanity.

Art does not shy from the truth and neither does Peter Leiss. In photograph, word and three dimensional object, he underlies our innate need for beauty and internal resonance by holding up the decayed and discordant. In each of the disciplines he employs, he plots the environment in which we have chosen to live.

Leiss' subtle photographs will not please the eye. Nor are they intended to. But they will widen them with a sense of astonishment that we tolerate such a high degree of the banal in our living space. They remind us that so many of our problems, including crime, poor health and injustice, stem from our apathy towards place.

There is no poetic melody in Leiss' verse. Here it would be out of place. Here is the poet pounding the drum to stir the silence and, struck as we are, the ears ring. We hear what we see in the photographs.

In the centrepiece, a sculptured trophy to all that we discard in our materialist pigsty, a finger points upward in a statement of "No to this!" while simultaneously reminding us that there is something higher.

Finally, the composition of Sidewinder cannot go unremarked. There is a legitimate artistic eye in the conception, design and construction of this work. It is the crystal-clear vision that generates it that gives it the energy to strike so forcibly as it comes at us out of left field.

- Howard F Dossor

Looks great, the photos, poem and sculpture all so very prophetic!

- Peita Collard

Congrats Peter- great work and fab to see you still fighting the creative fight. Proud of you and keep it up. Have a great deal of admiration for those who stick by their artistic guns- to mix metaphors. Very proud of you lad- seriously - good work.

Rich xx

- Dick Aspel

Hi Peter,

Love the sculpture—love the new book. Nicely done sculpture: simple, concise and scary. And made from found objects, as are your photographs. It takes an artist's eye to "find" these things that tell us so much about ourselves. I'm sure Pablo would approve. A great sense of composition and of color, and as always a sense of humor, well done, again.

Meanwhile, society spirals out of control. One of my favourite columnists, Eugene Robinson at the Washington Post, wrote "How dumb can a nation get and still survive?"

And congratulations,

Best, John

- John Deane

Thanks for Sending Peter,

As usual probing prodding exposing us to ourselves.

Are we listening or do we just have to check our phones.

Strange times indeed.

Love the urban tableaux.

I admire your energy. I must admit mine flags some times.

But we must press on.

Or maybe just sit and watch

Look forward to catching up sometime soon, when they let us all out

Robert

- Robert Ashton

Hi PT,

Sorry for the hiccup, the delayed response... I love Sidewinder and have a few faves: the reflective image with all of the wording/ads, the extremely pointed, piercing top of a building among some other building shapes and the fence and grass. The writing is, as usual, extremely good.

- Yvonne Westbrook

Hi Peter,

Let me add congrats on Sidewinder...I enjoyed it listening to Lee Morgan's version and they share the same driving rhythm.

Cheers, James

- James McArdle

Hi Peter. Good to hear from you. Your book and Jon's look fascinating.

- Ian Macrae

Firstly, congratulations on Sidewinder Peter. No rest for the wicked. I wish I could go forward with my work but I'm stuck in the past until I get it sorted.

- Philip Quirk

Congratulations Peter, on two beautiful books, Sidewinder & Conte's. Hope your going ok, love. X

- Louise Chen

Hi Peter,

Wow, great review. Can't get any better than that. Congratulations again. And inspiring, and here's why...

I finally got the final estimate in on my equipment. Including the $500 I already spent, the total is $4000! Everything needs repairing and even the flash tubes need to be replaced. I'm going to tell them to recycle it all and hopefully it doesn't wind up, as Dossor writes, just added it to "the detritus of our urbanity." No more studio photography for me. Time to turn the page and go "walkabout" again.

Cheers, John

Nice book Peter! Well done!

Metamorphosis

Short film adaptation of Franz Kafka's novella

Dear Peter,

It took some time ... and lockdown... to get me there, but I have now seen your 3-minute Metamorphosis, and I think it's the best short Metamorphosis-film I've ever seen.

Best wishes for your continuing success!

- Stanley A. Corngold

Professor of German & comparative literature at Princeton University

Well done, Peter! I like the way you develop the theme of art works. And that wonderful ancient bowl that Grete brings food for Gregor while she is trying to find out what he likes to eat now that he has undergone the metamorphosis. The bed sheets beneath which his transformation takes place are quite brilliant, as is the way sheets and curtains are used in the rest of the film. Thanks for sending the link! – Judith

Amerikan Peephole

Twenty-four Americans from New Mexico and California seek to weave a tapestry of meaning as they address pressing contemporary social and behavioural concerns within a Kafka motif.

AMERIKAN PEEPHOLE REVIEWS -

Pretty good...and pretty slick but also conceptually this is an interesting instinctive journey of discovery. Maybe a bit too fast for my slow brain at times but always engaging and even entertaining.

Your director's statement is pretty amazing too. I just hope that the people who hold the purse strings will have some idea about what you're driving at...Most of them are on a different planet...

-Paul Cox -Melbourne-based international film director

I just wanted to express how impressed we all were with the presentation of 'Amerikan Peephole', I really hope one of our Australian networks picks it up. Kind regards & keep'em coming.

-Daniel Bowden

Disappointed both with the quality of the filming and even more so, with the editing of the individual interviews. Presumably it might improve if you were to attempt personally to put the whole thing into some context at the beginning and wind it up with a conclusion with your own face speaking.

As for the individual opinions and the way they were edited without any attempt at individual or collective context gives the impression of a most unprofessional collection of spluttering weirdo's and NOT at all a sampling of average American opinions of their country - at least not the way I know them. Moreover there are several undue lengths and overbearing emphasis on long-winded and politically or sociologically irrelevant statements.

Remember that the majority opinion of Michael Moore's celebrated documentaries, even among Democrats was and is, that he may well have cost John Kerry the election with a severe case of insensitive and unsophisticated overkill.

-Francis Von Shoenborn -New Mexico-based TV host

The criticisms are good aren't they? You know, I don't even think Von Shoenborn is too bad either. He has some valid points. Some totally off the mark too. I agree with him about some of the interviewees go on but I also think it endears the people too because they are conversations not rehearsed delivered diatribes.

-Peita Collard -Melbourne-based theatre director and actor

Leiss brilliantly captures the essence of a world in crisis simply with candid, profound, and intelligent conversations with a group of articulate thinkers of diverse ages who maybe able to influence their/our society and the world at large to let go of the grip of ego and selfishness to create a better world, in Amerikan Peephole.

-Hiran Perera -Melbourne -based writer and publisher

Hey Peter, finally got time this afternoon to watch the film. Very impressive and more eye opening than we all realize

-Dolores San Miguel -Melbourne-based rock and roll manager

Watched "Peephole" this weekend. Great stuff - your usual assortment of American gems. "Fridgehenge?" That was a revelation - never heard of it before, but loved it. The bit about WTC7 was spooky. I never heard any controversy here in NYC about it collapsing, but, yeah, what did cause that? All in all, more thought provoking stuff from Mr Leiss. Well done.

-John Deane -New York-based photographer

I got the film and liked it. It is always a bit embarrassing to see yourself (me) on screen. The nervous tics, the all too familiar mannerisms that define one...but you definitely brought out something that most of America ignores, or cannot bring itself to say. It humanizes America, because it shows that in spite of the rest of the world's opinion of America as a monster, a heartless, out of control empire, it still has citizens who do not agree with the stato di cose. (Remember Winder's film, The State of Things?)

Since people can be so provincially grounded in their politics, it is often difficult as an American to travel. Europeans have the luxury of a colonial past well behind them, and can somehow make me, the American, responsible for the misdeeds of my leaders. Such a nationalist approach gets us nowhere. I also liked the splash/dash visuals of "America, out the car window, which is how most of us experience it.

-Laurence Malone -New Mexico-based writer and traffic critic

At the quest of meaning. The blind journey. The lack of control.
Our great minds can sometimes cause us great grief.
Food for thought but I don't know if I'm up to it. I sometimes turn to the east where they say that the answer is; "Don't ask the Question".

-Robert Ashton -Melbourne-based photographer

In his latest offering, 'Amerikan Peephole', Leiss has revived the art of the polemic in documentary film. By allowing his subjects the space to elaborate on their feelings and theories on contemporary American society and politics, we are given a glimpse of this most extraordinary period in modern US history, through the lens of some of its most strident native critics. Make no mistake, this is not your run of the mill documentary; there is no concession to 'objectivity' beyond that expressed by the interviewees themselves. They describe the legacy of the current administration's monstrous failure to aid the hurricane-stricken city of New Orleans and the impact of the costs born of foreign military adventurism. What we can take from this film is manifold: the meaning of post-Cold War triumphalism and the ramping-up of consumerism, the logical extension of George Bush senior's 1992 doctrine "the American lifestyle is not negotiable", or the inherent dangers of aggressive pre-emptive unilateralism. However, perhaps most significant is the Kafkaesque connotations of the neo-con juggernaut and its theoretically limitless war on 'terror', caught in full throttle before the 2006 congressional elections.

-Toby Heydon -Melbourne-based writer and historian

What a great concept, I, nor the others were bored for a second.
Amerikan Peephole makes fascinating watching. It tackles and gets to the core with a blend of poignancy and a touch of tenderness beneath.

The accessibility often missed in many films got us attached to the screen and looked at each other at the end of it. Just imagine the five of us watching and listening to 24 Amerikan in silence for 52 minutes. That says it all, I'd say.

-Yvonne Baggenstos

Many thanks for letting me see the comments on Peephole. I am sure you can believe that I was not surprised by anything I read in them. I can easily understand most of the comments being positive and I can readily understand the view expressed by Von Shoenborn - you might recall that I made the same suggestion about an opening statement. I hasten to add, however, that I think the finished product utterly vindicates the decision you made to go without the opening statement. On Von Shoenborn's opinion, one must collude that he is commenting on the film he might have made (had he been making one) and not on the film you made. I suggest that he is simply being bloody minded in deprecating the film quality and the editing standards. One must simply accept his point of view as an expression of his own idiosyncrasy.

I suggest that you would be justly entitled to think that these comments are, collectively, the most authoritative criticism you can expect to receive on your work. These, after all, are the people whose point of view you sought to communicate and they are telling you that you have succeeded in doing that. In a profound sense, whatever "professional" critics might have to say after they have seen the work is of little relevance (although, of course, one hopes they will say nice things). All in all, I think you can feel well pleased.

-Howard Dossor -Melbourne-base writer and literary academic

Just read all the critics from the bottom up. They say it well, as does Paul Cox. It's good to get constructive criticism, but I would tell Francis "thanks but come off it" - nothing longwinded in that. His segments in the film are some of the best, and we could use more of his drollery in his writing. His point about Michael Moore cost the election is total crap (pardon my unprofessional, scatological response), even if a few Democrats said it (I've never heard anyone say it), and reflects that he has not studied the way the elections of 00 and 04 were stolen. John Deane's response was interesting, as a New Yorker making reference to the WTC7 information unheard in the city of 9-11!!!

-Jim Coke -teacher, producer, photographer

Good work indeed! Visually and conceptually captivating. Amerikan Peephole is a remarkable and revelatory intersection of American Cultural Fringe, Radical Intellectual Elite and disaffected youth. The highway metaphor is a continuing reminder of lives spent in perpetual transience. Perhaps where the film scores its biggest impact though, is in what the film isn't overtly saying. Rather, it is what the viewer fills in. The important realization that Americans have not heard from this cross section of society in quite a while. Our cowering, corporate controlled media has successfully shut them out. However, after eight frightening years of the true radical fringe living out their apocalyptic vision of a new world order, how eminently and eloquently sane these voices now sound. The film simply couldn't be more timely.

Cakewalk 2001 & Cakewalking Again 2005

From the New York art world, Andy Warhol, Mickey Mouse to New Jersey, the diner capital of the world, we journey through the world of Robert Heide, John Gilman and Hoop, the King of Art, on an American Pop culture odyssey.

Reviews on Cakewalk -

The Hoop 'Remembrance' event at the Gershwin went very well. All his pals and his brother came as well as Carol Overby. The film, part one of, Cakewalk played on a big screen in the back room which went over in a really big way, lots of laughter, applause, etc. Taylor Mead who came declared it a first rate, terrific film and coming from him, this is great. Ended with a round of genuine and enthusiastic applause. Time has done very well by this film.

- Bob Heide & John Gillman

I LOVED IT! AND! I couldn't believe it but I know (by neighbourhood sightings) both those guys (Heide & Gilman)!! And, I've been seeing Hoop all over town for years. Glenn (who saw it with me) says one of the guys comes into the biography bookshop all the time to check out how his tour guidebooks are doing. He's actually pretty friendly with the owners. It's damn good! It has a wonderful Cinema Verite feel to it, almost as though it were done back in the 60's. You really NAILED NEW JERSEY! And the best part is that your two protagonists are alternately fabulous and pathetic at the same time.

The great music along with sandwiching the whole film between the magnificent opening and closing shots of the World Trade Center from Jersey lends it an eerie, almost macabre date stamp that somehow feels exactly right. Wish I had your talent.

- Renee Barkan –NY Theatre Producer (2x4 Productions)

I've always loved the title. I think it intrigues in a fun way. While the content of the film is not expressed, per se, by the title, it seems to read well to me and makes sense. It ties things into another time and is simply fun...

- John Currie –NY-based special education teacher

I loved side tripping through New Jersey with the king of art. What a DUDE.

- Robert Ashton –Melbourne-based photographer

We got your Cake Walk documentary last week and watched it immediately. Nobue and I both thought Cake Walk was fantastic. What a hoot! Now I can picture your frustration when you thought the whole thing was off, and then had to scramble to put it back together. It's really well done, great camera work and editing, and it really holds your interest. What characters! Well done, all your hard work paid off...

- John Deane –NY-based photographer

A few friends were visiting. A writer, an editor and other film related friends. So we watched Cake Walk. We all enjoyed it a lot. It kept everybody absorbed in the ever-delivering flow of surprises, smart cuts, good photography and witty choices. It's a winner!

It's truly brilliant because it's a risky subject matter... and you pulled it off.... Great to get a glimpse into another world so different to what is available otherwise. At first I was trying to make sense of the direction it was taking and soon I was being carried in the direction it was going... and I didn't care any longer where. I enjoyed the ride and letting someone else do the driving. I knew it was showing me around a neighbourhood full of pleasant surprises. Good editing. It flowed easily. I enjoyed seeing the excellent photography at the end. I recognized your eye. Good show!!

McSpedden, the man behind the myth

A film by Peter Leiss & Ian Wallace

Duration 44 minutes

Love your doc. Fantastic music and editing. The film looks great.

- Kara

TOTALLY EXCELLENT! ... Will finish the entire file when I get home from the Hospital on Wednesday/Thursday ... (y)

Thank you for remembering me!

Luv Ya Brother!

- Tony Funches

We both really enjoyed your film, well done and good on you for making it. Mic Conway might enjoy it.

- Jennifer Grimwade & Peter Scott

Thanks again for the lovely film. I watched McSpedden. Great work by Ian and you, a great character and I can now put his face to the work, especially the early band projections. But I must say his building projections and industrial sculpture are the winners for me. A man far ahead of his time in many respects.

- Philip Quirk

Thank you Peter,

I had no idea who McSpedden was although I have seen his projections on the Exhibition building and thought they were really good,

He is most unusual to say the least, I particularly liked the way in which you portrayed such a complex character, and think your photography is fantastic, such beautiful colour, hope we can catch up soon.

- Ron Murfett

I LOVED it! Especially the music choice. Perfect! Totally interesting too from a psychological perspective given the book on trauma and the mind I'm currently reading! Great film! Well done. If i had any criticisms it would be that I think after his opening spiel about getting there 1 minute past one, then you should have a text explaining who he is and maybe through the film little titles explaining what the situation he is talking about. I found it difficult to understand when he was talking about his therapy and the acid tests (were they acid tests?) and the circumstances that brought him there. But I really loved it! Top marks!!! x

- Peita Collard

Looks a bit like my place. Tidy soon. Trippy lightshows good for bands. Like the Central Lawn still.

- Joe Holzer

I loved McSpedden

You have a real gift for documentary filmmaking. What a character.

I remember those light shows.

- Gunter Kleemann

I had a look at the film, unfortunately I hardly understand the meanings of his talking, I am too less used. But the way the pictures telling shows quite well his interesting works with light.

By working in your archives you probably find yourself in all kind of moods you went through and beside that in a new perspective on the works you have done. It might be re-inspiring for new ideas?

- Ingrid Staedeli

Enjoyed seeing your latest film. It was interesting and informative. Well done.

- Barbara Derrick

Loved your film about Hugh McSpedden.

Important to recognise and celebrate our local artists and our local social history. I wasn't aware that his work covered so much ground. An inventor and a visionary. I hope it gets seen on TV?

- Robert Ashton

I thought your movie on McSpedden was great. He is such an odd character.

- Ian Macrae

Hi Peter,

We watched your movies the other day and were fascinated. I had never heard of McSpedden, and at first I saw him just as a contemporary of the Joshua Light Show that used to be featured at the Fillmore East, but he was so much more than that. I thought his hillside and building projects were beautiful, and so was your filming of him, by the way. Interesting angles, as usual. I liked the way you set the scene, a lovely bucolic setting, but before long you pan around the chaotic interiors and the viewer goes, "Hold on, now, what's all this?" The deeper you get into the film the more you see what an eccentric he is, but I'm no one to judge. I still have most of my negatives and slides, which fit neatly into a few boxes, and every digital image I ever took, which fits very nicely onto a single hard drive. Our stuff is just easier to store, isn't it?

Very entertaining portrait, well done!

The Spirit of Infirmity, a Parkinson's Diary

The Spirit of Infirmity, a Parkinson's Diary is a documentary produced by Richard Moir and Peter Leiss, members of the same team that created the award winning and Logie nominated, The Bridge at Midnight Trembles.

Focussing on Richard Moir and his courageous decision to undergo radical brain surgery to counteract the effects of Parkinson's disease, The Bridge at Midnight Trembles generated a tremendous response from viewers and health professionals alike when it was screened on SBS television in 2006. It subsequently screened in many countries around the world to similar acclaim.

This current production, The Spirit of Infirmity has a much broader scope. While it continues Richard's ongoing peregrination, it also follows other people dealing with Parkinson's and portrays the variety of their challenges and methods of coping.
